FINE BEEF.

Several months ago the Gazette printed an account of the exciting time experienced by Wilbert C. Baggett in attempting to drive four head of wild cattle from the Cameron St. wharf to his slaughter pens, two of the steers escaping and jumping into the river from the steamer that brought them to the city, one swimming across the Potomac and which had to be killed on the other side of the river, while the second was followed down stream by a launch and towed back to the wharf. Mr. Baggett has just purchased two more of these fine young geestrs from J. Fitz Jones, at Stewart's Wharf, Va., but had them killed and dressed at the wharf down the river, not wishing to repeat his experiment of shipping them here alive. The steers weighed 1500 and 1400 pounds and from some of the finest looking Virginia raised beef that Mr. Baggett has sold for some time past.

It is an easy matter to tell native raised stock from the range fed beef. The color of the meat will show from what kind of stock it comes. All farm fed native steers when killed have a fine, pure bright red even color, and if young and tender, will feel smooth as velvet to the touch, while the wild range grown stock will invariably show dark or black meat, sometimes streaky, half red, and half very dark or black, and feel coarser to the touch.

It is said that this is caused by the blood of the frightened steer becoming back just previous to its being killed.
